INTRODUCTION

The history of the Chicago Area Disaster Response Resource File is outlined in the original introduction written over 20 years ago and reprinted in full below. The usefulness of this resource seems more relevant than ever as we enter a millennium when global warming and its effects – extreme weather – have become common. The original document, intended to assist in the planning and implementation of disaster response and recovery, remains a practical tool in the preparation of Chicago area disaster response manuals for institutions large and small. It has been updated to include new members of DRAT and also includes websites and email addresses of individuals and companies as appropriate. The document – which still includes listings for Human Resources, Suppliers, Services, and Equipment – is available through the Newberry Library Conservation Department as a PDF with active links to those listings. For more information or to obtain a copy, please contact me at korbelb@newberry.org

Collections Conservator
The Newberry Library
May 2009*

The idea for this resource file evolved from two independent projects begun by two different groups of professionals. Both projects, however, were inspired by the same event. In the late afternoon of July 11, 1966, an exposed water main behind the Chicago Historical Society broke and began shooting water into the air. Before it could be shut off the water had filled a large foundation pit which had been excavated as part of the CHS building project. The water made its way underneath the foundation of the existing building and burst through the basement floor, flooding the basement to a level of 5 feet in some places.

The response of the CHS staff who witnessed the event was immediate. By 10:00a.m. the following morning a crew of staff and friends had already formed a “bucket brigade” to evacuate the bound news-papers that had gotten wet. Carol Turchan, CHS Conservator and Larry Viskachil, the Curator of Prints and Photographs had assembled about a dozen conservation specialists to assist them in salvaging the paintings, architectural drawings frames, sculpture, and other materials that had been affected. As one group of conservators and recovery assistance concentrated on carefully peeling apart soggy architectural drawing, someone suggested that the Chicago Area Conservations Group (CACG), an organization of conservation professionals compile a list of its members who could be contacted in an emergency situation to assist in the recovery of cultural artifacts. The list would include home phone number and a member's specialty so that a museum or library could efficiently identify the appropriate people and contact them immediately. This conversation, which took place in the dimly lit, silty basement of CHS the day following the flood, was the beginning of DRAT-the Disaster Recovery Action Team. Many of the people listed in the Human Resources section of this file are also DRAT participants

Another group of professional was inspired to act as a result of the CHS flood. The Chicago Museum Security Group placed on its agenda the possibility of exchanging resources such as personnel, storage space, and equipment should one of their members require emergency assistance. This group of security directors from Chicago area museums began to identify what each museum might need to respond to an emergency and what each could offer other museums struck by disaster.

As Richard West, then the Chief Security Officer of the Newberry Library and, I exchanged information about these activities and discussed disaster planning and recovery from both our perspectives, we realized that many of the resources that any museum or library would require to respond quickly and efficiently to an emergency are the same. Furthermore, not all museums and libraries have access to the security and/or conservation expertise to assistance in their disaster preparedness planning or their response. We concluded that if a list of resources could be compiled with the assistance of security and conservation professional, it could them be made available to any library and museum in the Chicago area. This would eliminated museum of the duplicated effort occurring as each institution prepares the resources section of their comprehensive disaster preparedness plan and it would benefit institutions who are unable to dedicate the staff time to compile an extensive list of resources.

A proposal to create a computer resource file, which could be shared with other cultural institutions, was submitted to the Chicago Community Trust for funding consideration. The Chicago Community Trust awarded the Newberry Library a Technical Assistance grant to support the first phase of the project. The resources in this file were identified with the assistance of individuals from a core group of Chicago area institutions. The information was entered into a database at the Newberry Library so that is could be indexed and easily updated. The result is the Chicago Area Disaster Response Resource Files. We intend to continue this project by regularly updating the information contained in the resource file, and making it available to any individual or institution at cost.

I wish to thank all of the people in the core group who contributed information for the Resource File. Special thanks to Richard West for his ideas and help in preparing the grant proposal and securing the cooperation of the Chicago Museum Security Group. Thanks also to the DRAT members who agreed to be a part of this publication. Above all, the Chicago Community Trust deserves recognition for making this project possible.

HUMAN RESOURCES

Human resources are divided into three categories: conservators (subdivided by specialty), technical assistants (with their technical specialty noted), and recovery assistants.

Conservators are professionals with knowledge of the appropriate salvage techniques for specific types of materials. These materials may include: books, objects, paintings, photographs, textiles, and works of art on paper. The conservators listed are available to advise on the recovery of materials in their field of expertise.

Technical Assistants are professionals with science backgrounds who have volunteered to provide technical assistance in the salvage of cultural materials. Their fields of expertise are varied and include: chemical analysis, microscopy, spectroscopy, freeze-drying, plasma treatment.

Recovery Assistants are individuals who work as artists, conservation technicians, and curators who have volunteered to perform manual labor during a disaster recovery under the direction of an appropriate professional.
